Stellick, currently the lone analyst covering the stock, believes Valeo "represents good upside in the short to medium term." She says the company has a "proven" record in partnering with specialty pharmaceutical firms to commercialize their products for the Canadian market. Valeo currently has seven marketed products with two more set for the coming months and another three expected over the next 12 months. She calls two of these products, Redesca for treating blood clots and bioflavonoid HesperCo, "game-changing opportunities." As Stellick concludes in the initiation note: "Valeo leverages its strong partnerships created over the past seventeen years to focus on building its portfolio to meet the needs of specialists within its three targeted therapeutic areas. The company searches for products with potential Canadian revenues between $5-20-million, which is generally below the threshold of interest for large multinational companies to pursue directly."

Silvercorp Metals Inc (CVE:SVM) is rated at "hold" in new coverage by Canaccord Genuity analyst Dalton Baretto who says investors seeking leverage to the price of silver might want to consider the company, according to The Globe and Mail's latest edition. Baretto targets the shares at $12; analysts on average target the shares at $10.50. In a note, Baretto said: "Our estimates indicate that the company does not currently offer meaningful production or cash flow growth (relative to its precious metals producer peers) but does offer a clean balance sheet and a track record of disciplined capital allocation. ... SVM offers the highest revenue exposure to silver among the mid-cap precious metals producers we cover. We estimate SVM will generate two-thirds of its revenue from silver. In our view, this exposure, coupled with the recent rise in investor interest in silver leverage, could provide SVM with a 'scarcity premium' in its trading multiples. We believe this is already occurring: SVM currently trades at 12.4 times our 2021 EBITDA estimate and 1.7 times NAV, vs. the mid-cap precious metals peer group averages of 5.3 times and 1.1 times, respectively."
